

The Challenge of Delivering Results in Development

In recent years a kind of results revolution has swept through many development agencies. Recipients, funders, and commentators have called for greater accountability and more precise results reporting. In response, agencies have ushered in new metrics, enhanced results frameworks, new aid instruments, novel accountability systems and innovative ways of communicating impact. Yet there are questions about attribution, measurement and what constitutes genuinely transformational change. This talk offers propositions on a way forward that will enhance the impact of aid agencies without compromising credibility.
