Panel 1: The Institutional Foundations for Performance Budgeting

Barry Anderson

Barry Anderson is currently Head of the Budgeting and Public Expenditures Division within the Public Governance and Territorial Development Service of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). In this position, Mr. Anderson provides OECD's Working Party of Senior Budget Officials (SBO) with identification and analyses of international budget trends and issues. He also provides similar assistance to senior budget officials in Africa, Asia, Central Europe, Latin America, and the Middle East/North Africa region. Mr. Anderson is a recognized expert on budget rules, budget formulation and implementation, and budgetary accounting.

Prior to joining OECD, Mr. Anderson was a budget advisor at the International Monetary Fund, where he consulted with senior government officials on budget and management issues, including: fiscal rules; public-private partnerships; performance budgeting; and the organization and operation of central budget offices. Before joining IMF, Mr. Anderson served in various positions dealing with federal budgeting in the United States Federal Government, most recently as the Deputy Director and then the Acting Director of the Congressional Budget Office; before that as the Assistant Director and senior career civil servant at the White House's Office of Management and Budget; and before that at the General Accounting Office. In these positions, he helped draft and implement the Budget Enforcement Act, the Gramm-Rudman Act, and every other major budget control act enacted by Congress. He also represented the United States and chaired OECD's SBO meetings. He has also been a member of the Federal Accounting Standards Advisory Board, and a private consultant.

He currently is a member of the Board of the Center on Federal Financial Institutions and of the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, and he has lectured on federal budgeting at the George Washington University and for the Office of Personnel Management. He received his MBA from the University of Washington, and his undergraduate degree from the University of Illinois.
